SCIENTIFIC ACTIVITY

Dr. Moreno's scientific activity is documented by 84 peer-reviewed publications (total Impact Factor 270, h-Index 31, total citations 7326, according to Scopus) and numerous presentations at international meetings. Research interests, mostly in the neuroscience field, are as follows:

- Role of peroxisomes in health and disease, including neurodevelopment and neurodegeneration. Multiple molecular and morphological approaches are utilized to study peroxisome biogenesis and metabolism, in developing, adult, aging and degenerating central nervous system (CNS), with special reference to Alzheimer’s disease (AD) and amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS).
- Cell death vs. survival pathways in CNS development and neurodegenerative processes. The role of apoptosis, and autophagy in the nervous system is being investigated in in vivo and in vitro models of neurodegenerative diseases, including AD and ALS.
- Involvement of antioxidant response in neurodegeneration and neuroresilience. The regulatory role played by peroxisome proliferator activated receptors (PPARs) and their cofactor PGC1 $\alpha$  in brain oxidative stress management is studied with reference to energy metabolism pathways involving peroxisomes and mitochondria, in AD and in Non-Demented with Alzheimer’s pathology individuals” (NDAN).
- Study of pathomechanisms underlying rare neurodevelopmental disorders, by induced pluripotent stem cells (iPSCs) technology. We focus on Riboflavin Transporter Deficiency (RTD) and PCHD19, which have severe neurological implications. Patient-specific iPSCs and derived motor neurons are being investigated, with special reference to cytoskeleton, mitochondria and peroxisome dysfunction, thanks to a collaborative effort with research groups based at Bambino Gesù Hospital.

For the above goals, combined neuromorphological and molecular approaches are utilized, including development of innovative strategies for ultrastructural investigation (e.g., FIB/SEM).
